PARENTING IS A DIFFICULT LEADERSHIP ROLE

Helping children understand their emotions is critical to this role.

Let's face it, children achieve the most direction and influence from their parents. Yet charting a healthy course for children requires a far better understanding than most parents have concerning the helpful and harmful effects of emotions. With emotionally intelligent guidance, children face more of life's challenges, healthfully, than otherwise possible.

If we were to ask the role society expects of parents, it would be to play a major role in shaping the quality of psychological development of a child's mind. Society relies on parents to prepare children to make the most of their formal education and to become performing assets to society, family, and themselves. It is to society's advantage for parents to teach their children an abundance of psychological competencies important to adulthood. Realize that when parents have the tools and time to teach such competencies, society gains the highest of dividends.

As with quality leaders, in general, parents qualifications and insight are instrumental in molding their child's behavior in more emotional stable ways. Parents maximize leadership potential when they are motivated to face parental challenges responsibly and utilize helpful parenting resources for guidance. Emotional intelligence educational tools can help parents improve social and behavioral outcomes in their children. To learn more, search for emotional intelligence on the Internet or at your local library/book store. With more awareness, parents around the world should be in a position to foster a higher standard of social harmony. EI Awareness Month is an international campaign effort directed by the Emotional Intelligence Institute, a non-profit organization dedicated to helping people improve their emotional intelligence.
